This edition of Kafka's aphorisms contains both his better-known Zůrau Aphorisms, and writings under the title of "He" : Notes from the Year 1920. The aphorisms read like fragments from Heraclitus, heavy with the boundlessness of pre-Socratic philosophy; yet with that unique style, tone, and touch that is Kafka's.

The Zůrau Aphorisms by Franz Kafka - Goodreads

Kafka took up residence with his sister Ottla in Zurau, a small town in northern Bohemia, shortly after being diagnosed with tuberculosis in early September, 1917. It seems likely most of the aphorisms were composed at Zurau, even though some material does originate later.

The life of the crow = the death of heaven (individuation) The death of the crow = an entrance to heaven (oneness) The aphorism says nothing about heaven for heaven is merely a state of existence which precludes independent objects. For heaven to exist there can be no crow. Heaven is the impossibility of crows.
